GAO releases Roswell inquiry results

On July 28, 1995, the General Accounting Office (GAO) released the results of its inquiry in the 1947 Roswell incident. The GAO is the investigative branch of the U.S. Congress, it began its inquiry into the Roswell incident in 1994 at the request of New Mexican Congressman Steven Schiff. The Roswell incident concerns the alledged crash of a UFO in the desert near Roswell, New Mexico in early July of 1947. Initially the local military announced that they had captured a "flying disc". In 1947, the U.S. was rocked by nation-wide UFO sightings. Needless to say, the press descended on Roswell. Immediatly, the higher military authorites announced that nothing more exotic than a weather balloon had crashed at Roswell. For years, accusations of a conspiracy and a cover-up were fired at the government. Then, in September of 1994, shortly after the start of the GAO inquest, the U.S. Air Force released a report stating that what had actually crashed was a secret spy balloon from "Project Mogul". It was intended for detecting evidence of Russian nuclear experiments in the upper atmosphere.

Now, after a long search for information, the GAO has released their version of the story. They received little help from government agencies related with the incident. They were only provided with two documents related to the incident, both concerned the weather balloon story. They did discover that all the records of outgoing communications from Roswell Army Air Filed from the period of the incident had been mysteriously destroyed. Discoveries like this only support the government conspiracy theory. Nothing concrete will be known until the government authorites responsible for this wall truly come clean about the events at Roswell instead of spewing stories of crash-prone balloons.
